1 What do I want to learn or understand better?

We haven't started implementing any heavy functionality yet. I am currently excited but also a little nervous about starting to code. Since I am not completely comfortable in coding, I will make sure I have complete understanding of the features I will be implementing, and I will ask my teammates for feedback on code I am unsure about.

2 How can I help someone else, or the entire team, to learn something new?

So far I've been busy both before and after meetings, so if there has been something left to discuss or if someone has had something left to finish I haven't always been able to stay (and possibly help). No one has needed/requested help yet, however some have been good at asking if others have needed help. So I hope to have a clearer schedule soon so that I can support the team either by just being there as company or help when meetings are running a little late.

3 What is my contribution towards the team's use of Scrum?

We have all, together as a team, created a scrumboard and all of us have contributed by writing user stories and reflecting upon the "horizontal" components necessary to deliver our "vertical slices". I feel like I have sufficient knowledge about the Scrum process to participate and contribute to the discussion.

4 What is my contribution towards the team's deliveries?

This week I have, like the others in the group, made a pingbot. We had a tutorial session where we all sat down and made our own pingbot and connected it to our server to make sure we all get familiar with the setup process and the bot basics. I'm happy with my contribution and I, of course, aim to reach my individual goals the coming weeks as well. I think asking for help when necessary will be important for both my learning and my deliveries.
